

Long ago, during a severe drought, the blazing sun scorched the earth under a cloudless blue sky. All the pelicans panicked, squawking to one another to flee from the south to the north.

Early in the morning, the heat was already unbearable, and the flock hurriedly took flight.

At the end of the group, a little pelican and his mother flew side by side. The mother flew close by, guarding him and cheering him on.

A mother pelican with a red checkered headscarf is flying in the sky, holding her young chick in her beak. The mother pelican has a long orange beak and is looking down at the chick. The chick is also a pelican with a long orange beak and is looking up at its mother. The sky is a mix of blue, yellow, and orange, suggesting a sunset or sunrise. The mother pelican's wings are spread wide, showing black feathers on the underside. The chick's wings are also spread wide, showing black feathers on the underside. The mother pelican's feet are visible, and she is holding the chick by the back of its neck. The chick's feet are also visible. The overall scene is a heartwarming illustration of a parent bird caring for its young.

“Hold on, my dear,” said the mother. “There are plenty of cool lakes and yummy fish waiting for you in the north!”

“Really? Yay! That sounds amazing!” cheered the little pelican.

His mother smiled, “There you’ll be able to spread your wings wide over blue water and enjoy all the vibrant colours of the mountains and forests!”

The little pelican blinked and started imagining all the wonderful things in the new land. These thoughts urged him to flap his wings harder to keep up with the flock.
